FOREWORD

This report on “Arab Civil Societies and Public Governance Reform - An Analytical Framework and Overview” is among a series of reports conducted within the framework of the Good Governance for Development (GfD) initiative. The objective of this preliminary report is to examine the state of civil societies and the ongoing modernizing initiatives in a number of Arab countries.

The regional and national reports seek to define a framework, which could be used at a later phase to compile information and indicators paving the way for the launching of the initiative.

DEFINITIONS AND POTENTIAL ROLES OF ARAB CIVIL SOCIETIES

Civil society is today a very familiar term in Arab political and developmental discourses. However, as in the international debates, the definition and the meaning remain somehow elusive and controversial. Although there is generally an agreement that civil society is the social space outside of family, the state and the market, different views are offered on whether civil society is a descriptive or a normative concept and whether it should include such borderline groups as the informal and kinship based networks, the religiously based organizations or the political parties.

This paper will not review and discuss the many positions taken in this debate by Arab analysts and intellectuals over the last two decades. For the purpose of this overview, a descriptive definition of civil society will be adopted, excluding from it the necessary adoption of specific values, such as a secular orientation, civility in dealing with others, respect for differences, or a commitment to peaceful management of conflict

For us, Arab civil societies will encompass all associations or organizations that are private, voluntary, not for profit, at least partly independent or autonomous from the state and are pursuing a common interest, protecting a common value or advocating a common cause. We will exclude kinship based groups and family associations as too close to the space of the family. We will exclude political parties as too close to the political space and at least in theory, focused on the pursuit of political power. As for the religiously based organizations, we will include faith based charities, social services and development organizations, but exclude organizations focused on specifically religious practices and requirements of the cult.

In reviewing the available literature on Arab civil societies, one can note easily the predominance of speculative or notional debates, the tendency to generalize for the Arab region without a proper consideration of the significant intraregional variations and the pendulum swing between unrealistic hopes for the actual or potential roles of Arab civil societies and undue skepticism or structural pessimism concerning their contribution to change and public governance reforms. The domination of general and often ideological discourses about Arab civil societies has also been at the expense of analytical research, in-depth monographs and case studies, and empirical evaluation of specific experiences.

Although in the most recent years, more focused and empirical researches has been conducted, this paper will reflect by necessity the current state of studies of Arab civil societies and the severe limitations it put on any extensive assessment of the role of civil societies in public governance reforms. What is proposed here are mainly an analytical framework and an overview of the current conditions of Arab civil societies and what can be said of their emerging role in change and reforms: To what extent, civil society organizations (CSO's) or a certain part of them in certain Arab countries on certain issues, are starting to become agents of public governance reforms, agents of public policies alternatives, and agents of accountability and democratization.

THE COMPOSITION AND SIZE OF ARAB CIVIL SOCIETIES

We will start by suggesting an analytical typology of Arab civil society's organizations, regrouping them into five main functional categories or categories of principal activity.

The five categories are the following:

1. Leisure and socializing activities
2. Social assistance and social service delivery
3. Knowledge oriented activities
4. Societal interest representation
5. Public interest advocacy

If we expand the five main categories of civil society's organizations into their main constitutive subcategories, we will obtain the following table:

1 LEISURE AND SOCIALIZING ACTIVITIES:

- Social, local and youth clubs
- Recreational associations
- Sports associations

2 SOCIAL ASSISTANCE AND SOCIAL SERVICES DELIVERY:

- Mutual aid groups and community development organizations
- Welfare associations
- Services and development NGO's

3 KNOWLEDGE ORIENTED ACTIVITIES:

- Cultural associations
- Research promotion association
- Educational associations

4 SOCIETAL INTEREST REPRESENTATION:

- Membership-based interest groups:
  - Business associations
  - Professional associations
  - Trade Unions

- Membership based sectoral movements:
  - Women's movements
  - Youth movements
  - Cultural movements

5 PUBLIC INTEREST ADVOCACY:

- Issue oriented organizations:
  - Human rights
  - Women's rights
  - Worker's rights
  - Good governance and accountability:
    - Democratization
    - Rule of law
    - Transparency and integrity
    - Election monitoring
    - Civic and voter's education
  - Environment protection
  - Heritage protection
  - Consumer protection

- Independent public fora
- Independent policy research institutions

As we go from category one to category five we can assume that we go from the less to the more involved associations in issues of public governance reform and social and political change in the Arab region. We can assume also that we go from the more self centered associations to the service oriented associations, to the membership interest centered associations to the organizations presumably focused on the public interest. Thus in each Arab country the relative weight and the level of autonomy and activity of each category of civil society organizations might determine to what extent civil society is starting to influence public sector and public governance reform in the country concerned.

Unfortunately, there no available systematic mapping and substantial data bases of Arab CSO's on a regional or on a national basis, except under the format of simple listings or summary directories of associations for countries like Egypt, Palestine and Jordan and partly for Lebanon, Yemen and Morocco. These sources contain little information on size, activities, membership, or functional budgets. They are mostly based on registries of Ministries of Interior or Ministries of Social Affairs. They are sometimes outdated and do not necessarily distinguish between active or inactive associations. They are the bases on which some rough global figures are sometimes mentioned concerning the total number of associations in several Arab countries.

The following table presents figures compiled by the Arab Network of Civil Society Organizations on the estimated total numbers of civil society organizations and the evolution of these numbers over the Nineties of the last century

Civil society organizations in the Arab region
(1991-2001)

Countries	Numbers in 2001-2	Numbers in 1991-2	Increase in %
Algeria	58,000	–
Morocco	30,000	–
Egypt	16,000	13,000	23
Tunisia	7,500	5,200	44
Lebanon	3,600	1,300	177
Yemen	2,700	250	980
Jordan	900	587	53
Bahrain	321	66	386
Sudan	246	262	-6
Saudi Arabia	230	125	84
United Emirates	113	89	27
Kuwait	103	55	87

The previous table gives an order of magnitude of the total identified civil society associations and organizations in twelve Arab countries at the beginning of the current decade. Although large numbers could be associated sometimes with high level of fragmentation or inclusion of peripheral categories of associations (like parents associations and students clubs in Algerian schools), they could reflect to a significant extent the degree of collective organization and joint action within a specific society and the size of its public space. In this respect, the North African countries, Egypt, Lebanon and Yemen seem to have numerically large (and active?) civil societies. The Gulf, Sudan and the rest of the Machrek seem to have much more limited civil societies.

If we consider now the evolution of numbers during the last decade, we could note interesting differential trends: An absolute decrease in Sudan; a small increase from a small base in Saudi Arabia, Kuwait and the United Emirates; a moderate increase from a large base in Jordan, Egypt and Tunisia; a large increase (twofold and fourfold) in Lebanon and Bahrain; and a very large increase from a relatively small base in Yemen. Unfortunately, no figure is available to measure the ten year trend in the two leading countries of Algeria and Morocco, although we can safely assume a very large increase (some authors speak of an explosion) in the case of Algeria, and a large increase in the case of Morocco.

Many factors could explain these trends of the nineties, including the end of the civil war in Lebanon, the semi-liberalization measures in Yemen and Jordan, the very liberal new regulation on associations in Algeria, and the fast expansion of the civil society organizations after the association of opposition to power in Morocco. In the above mentioned countries, the nineties were undoubtedly a period of horizontal expansion of civil societies.

A more weighted way to compare countries of the region is to relate the number of organizations to the respective population in each country. One would thus obtain a kind of density index of civil society organizations in the Arab region.

Density of civil society organizations in the Arab region
(2001)

Countries	Number of organizations in 2001-2	Population in 20001 (in millions)	Organizations per 100,000 inhabitant
Algeria	58,000	31	187
Morocco	30,000	29,2	103
Lebanon	3,600	3,6	100
Tunisia	7,500	9,7	53,6
Bahrain	3,600	0,7	45,8
Egypt	16,000	65,3	24,5
Jordan	900	5,2	15,5
Yemen	2,700	19	14
Kuwait	103	2,3	4,4
United Emirates	113	3,3	3,4
Saudi Arabia	230	21	1,1
Sudan	246	37	0,6

The table confirms the wide variations in relative density of civil society organizations among Arab countries: A comparatively high density (between 100 and 200 organizations per 100,000 inhabitants) in Algeria, Morocco and Lebanon; a average density (between 25 and 50) in Tunis, Bahrain and Egypt; a relatively low density (around 15) in Jordan and Yemen; a very low density (between 1 and 5), in the Gulf states and Sudan. Although the Arab densities, on average, are much lower than averages in developed countries and many developing countries (from several hundreds to several thousands organizations per 100,000 inhabitants), variations within the Arab region are also quite large today extending from one to almost 200 organizations per 100,000 inhabitants.

In very few cases, one could go beyond the global figures to breakdowns according to the main categories of civil society organizations. A recently published compilation and survey of the Jordanian CSO's in the late nineties prepared by the New Jordan Research Center, gives more details on numbers of organizations and total membership by various categories of CSO's. In the following table we have regrouped the figures of the Jordanian survey according to the five analytical and functional categories suggested earlier in this paper.

Distribution of civil society organizations in Jordan (1998)

Categories	Number of organizations	Percentage of total number	Membership	Percentage of total membership
Recreational and socializing	306	19.9	26,500	3.7
Welfare and social services	734	47.6	106,000	14.8
Educational and cultural	256	16.6	14,000	1.9
Societal interest representation:
Business and small owners	86	5.6	74,000	10.3
Professional associations	13	0.8	80,000	11.2
Workers trade unions	17	1.1	183,000	25.6
Women's movement	97	6.3	150,000	21
Youth movements	14	0.9	73,000	10.2
Public interest advocacy organizations	18	1.2	8,000	1.3
Total	1,541	100	714,500	100

The distribution table reveals a number of patterns particular to the Jordanian civil society but not very dissimilar to distribution patterns in other Arab civil societies, according to qualitative studies and partial surveys available on other countries.

The welfare and social services category alone represent about half of the total number of organizations and associations. It is followed by the recreational and socializing category (one fifth) and the cultural and educational category (one sixth). Business associations (large and small) and women's organizations represent each about 5-6% of the total number. Professional associations, trade unions, youth movements (mainly students) and public interest advocacy organizations are few in numbers and represent each about 1% of the total number of organizations.

The distribution of membership according to the survey reveals a different structure. About one quarter of the total membership of civil society organizations belongs to the trade unions, a share not surprising and even relatively low compared to international figures. Almost as much, one fifth is affiliated with women's organizations, which is more surprising and could reflect the expansion of women's collective organization and action in Jordan (and probably in the region) in the last couple of decades. One sixth of membership is affiliated with the numerous welfare and social services organizations which have spread across the whole national territory. One tenth of total membership goes to each of the business associations, the professional associations and the student organizations. Recreational and socializing, and educational and cultural organizations, although representing together 36.5% of the total number of organizations, do not include more than 5.6% of total membership. They seem to be mostly small and local organizations. Finally, the new and vocal public interest advocacy groups, about twenty organizations out of fifteen hundred, do not represent more than one percent of both the total number of organizations and the total membership.

These figures, which are often claims of membership by the various groups, do not tell a lot about levels of activities, efficiency or commitment of membership and could often rely on formal criteria and a limited level of members' participation. They do however give an approximate idea of the relative weight of the different category of CSO's in the Jordanian society.

A similar extensive survey of Egyptian CSO's was conducted in 1994 under the auspices of the Al Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Research. It shows very comparable results, with a larger share for religiously based organizations, both Muslim and Christian and a significant component of rural community development organizations and urban migrants mutual aid associations on a regional origin basis mainly in Cairo and Alexandria.

Tables listing the most visible and maybe the most active CSO's in the categories four and five (societal interest representation and public interest advocacy), in ten Arab countries are included in the Annex to this paper. While again based on summary directories and/or the existence of internet sites, they nonetheless give a certain image of the current spread and diversity of Arab CSO's most concerned by issues of public governance reforms.

THE STATE-CIVIL SOCIETY RELATIONS: FROM SUPPRESSION TO PARTNERSHIP.

State-civil society relationships are crucial determinants of the capacity of CSO's to be self organized and self regulated, to provide public goods and services, to conduct efficient social action or to influence the public sphere and public policy.

Within the Arab region today, there are wide variations in the way states relate to emerging civil societies and forms of associative life.

At one end of the spectrum few states, like Libya, Syria and most of the Gulf States, still directly suppress and prohibit the establishment of independent citizen organizations. Whatever social organizations exist is state or ruling party run or tightly state controlled through direct appointment of their leaderships and boards. Social services organization, professional associations or trade unions, when they exist, are like arms or appendages of the state, extending its outreach or control over society. The model is either a left conservative (corporatist) or right conservative (neo-patriarchal) vision of an integrated harmonious ensemble where the state, who knows better, orchestrates and guides the society and its components as one organic whole.

At the medium part of the spectrum, states in transition, like Kuwait, Bahrain, Egypt, Yemen or Tunisia, have a diversity of social organizations. Some of them are still of the state run or controlled type. Some of them have been for sometime semi-autonomous and the objects of claims by independent or oppositional forces, within their membership or leadership. Others are emerging independent organizations struggling to acquire legitimacy and efficiency as proponents of alternative development activities, articulators of societal interest or advocates of public interest issues and specific public policies.

In several of these societies, the nature of state-civil society relationship and the existing legal and regulatory frameworks have been recently objects of vigorous debates and contestation.

At the other end of the spectrum, states like Lebanon, Morocco, Algeria and the Palestinian Authority have accepted traditionally (for Lebanon) or have come recently to accept (for the others) the existence and expansion of a vibrant civil society that they still try to manipulate or co-opt, but also increasingly treat as a partner in development activities or public policy implementation.

In most of the states of the Arab region, freedom of association remains the exception rather than the rule. In almost all countries, establishing a civil society association requires a permit by the relevant ministry, and going through a tedious and lengthy administrative and security clearance process. Decisions of the administrative authority remain often discretionary and not open to judiciary recourse. For most civil society associations the authority delivering the permit of establishment is the Ministry of Interior in Jordan, Tunisia and Algeria, the Ministry of Social Affairs in Egypt, Yemen, Palestine and Kuwaiti, and the general secretariat of the Government in Morocco. Other categories of associations are sometimes linked to the ministries of culture, labor or economy.

This inhibiting legal framework is complemented by a tight regulatory control and a battery of legal measures that the administrative authority can use to restrict the autonomy and activities of civil society organizations. In many countries of the region the controlling ministry can: Cancel Board elections; oppose veto on candidates; appoint provisional boards; enforce merger of associations; close headquarters and offices; impose heavy fines for mismanagement; require prior approval for any donation; impose prior control on expenditures; dissolve associations by ministerial decree; requisition assets of dissolved associations and prohibit activities on security grounds.

In that respect, the more severe measures are included in the association laws and reflected in the administrative practices of Egypt, Jordan, Palestine and Tunis. Less severe measures are included in the recently reformed laws of Algeria, Morocco and Yemen.

Lebanon is the only case where no formal administrative permit is required by the old 1909 Ottoman law on associations still in effect. The only requirement is a notification of the act of incorporation and the by laws to the Ministry of Interior against deliverance of a receipt. Recent practices have tried to turn this deliverance of a receipt by the ministry into the equivalent of a permit. This practice has been vigorously opposed by Lebanese incorporators of civil society associations and was recently overturned by a ruling of the high administrative court.

THE INTERNAL LIMITATIONS OF ARAB CIVIL SOCIETY ORGANIZATIONS

In addition to the restrictions imposed by authoritarian or semi-authoritarian states and to the often inhibiting legal and regulatory frameworks, Arab civil society organizations are limited in their autonomy and efficiency by constitutive and internal factors that affect their development and impact. We will briefly mention below the main limitative factors often underlined by analysts and observers of Arab civil societies.

■ A WEAK CONTEMPORARY CULTURE OF CIVIC PARTICIPATION.

A long history of external (Ottoman) and colonial domination followed by mostly authoritarian and repressive post independence regimes has bred a political culture of fear, apathy, withdrawal from the public sphere and instinctive mistrust. Against this entrenched background, a new culture of active citizenship, social collaboration, and autonomous collective action, favorable to the development of civil society, is emerging slowly and with difficulty.

■ A STRUCTURAL DEPENDENCY ON THE STATE.

Most Arab economies are still dominated by the public sector as a producer or as a client, far more than in other low or middle income countries in the world. The increasingly expanding private sector itself is still largely dependent on contracts, favors or incentives from the state. The share of public civil and military employment in urban sectors is still quite large. In this context, trade unions, development CSO's, chambers of commerce or professional associations cannot easily affirm their autonomy or challenge and contest state policies or state wishes.

■ LIMITED CONSTITUENCIES AND SHALLOW COMMITMENT OF MEMBERS.

Most of the Arab civil society organizations, even those claiming relatively large numbers of members, have weak capacities to relate to or to mobilize their members and even more so the larger constituencies that could support their action. Trade unions or professional associations' board elections, for example, often have turn out of no more than 10-15% of nominal membership in large countries like Egypt, and no more than 20-25% in smaller countries like Lebanon and Jordan.. Demonstrations and others forms of mass action, whenever they are allowed, include few hundreds or to the most few thousands participants from supposedly large organizations.

■ WEAK INTERNAL GOVERNANCE AND ORGANIZATIONAL STRUCTURES.

Several Arab civil society organizations have either bureaucratic structures that resemble in small the state bureaucracy authoritarian structures or they have loose and ineffectual structures unable to support sustained and complex organizational or mobilization work. In addition many organizations do not embody the accountable and transparent governance they have been calling for. Instead, leadership does not easily rotate and can be as entrenched as the dominant political power structure; decision-making can be very concentrated and opaque; and accountability to members and constituencies tend to be limited.

■ PRECARIOUS, CONDITIONAL, OR DONOR-DRIVEN FUNDING.

Many Arab civil society organizations lack financial autonomy and/or solidity. The mobilization of their own internal resources tend be limited either because of members' reluctance to pay significant dues and contributions or because of the general socio-economic conditions. Several organizations rely largely on state funding but often with political strings attached or as political clienteles of state leadership. Local philanthropy is often limited to traditional support for social welfare organizations and in most Arab states there no legal framework and fiscal incentives for philanthropic donations. In several cases states look with suspicion and even prohibit private donations to civil society organizations that would increase their financial autonomy and reduce their dependency on the state.

In the last couple of decades, international donors have become a major source of funding in countries like Morocco, Egypt, Jordan or Palestine, for at least two sectors of Arab civil societies, the social services and development CSO's and the more recently established public interest advocacy group. The fears (sometimes paranoid) of foreign interference in "sensitive" issues, hidden agendas and political manipulation have made of foreign funding for civil society the object of much controversy within Arab societies and with the concerned states. Many states who do not have any hesitation to actively lobby for foreign funding for them want to prohibit or at least to tightly control any foreign funding of civil society organizations. In any case, sources and sustainability of funding remain a major issue for Arab civil society development.

■ ORGANIZATIONAL FRAGMENTATION AND IDEOLOGICAL POLARIZATIONS.

Many Arab civil society organizations do not have the critical size to be able to carry alone significant or sustainable activities and to achieve a meaningful impact. In addition, most of them have difficulties working together, pooling resources, sharing services or building coalitions in order to increase the efficiency of their social interventions. Multiplication of competing and overlapping organizations affects several sectors such as health service providers, micro credit organizations, women's associations or human rights groups. In spite of the recent emergence of few regional or national networks mainly in countries like Lebanon, Morocco or Palestine, the cooperative work among Arab civil society organizations remain quite limited. In addition, in the last two decades, a growing ideological polarization and sometime a rift have developed between faith-based and, at the margin, fundamentalist inspired organizations, on the one side, and secularist and leftist oriented organizations, on the other side. In several instances Arab civil societies have been or appeared to be on the verge of civil strife.

AN EMERGING CONTRIBUTION TO PUBLIC GOVERNANCE REFORMS

In spite of the constraining role of most Arab states and the structural and internal limitations of Arab civil societies, Arab CSO's have significantly diversified their forms of influence and increased their level of intervention in the public sphere in several Arab countries. Over the last decade, from Morocco to Yemen and from Algeria to Jordan, many CSO's started campaigning for changes in policies and legislation, mobilizing for the defense of the public interest and public values, engaging in observation and monitoring of public agencies and officials, producing alternative analysis and policy proposals and contributing actively to the development of the public debate.

In several Arab countries the public space today is quite different from what it used to be less than twenty years ago. The state and the political elite do not have any more a monopoly over the setting of the public agenda or the content of public discourses. A new set of actors from the civil society is more and more engaging with or challenging official discourses and raising new issues of public governance that are slowly being put on the national agendas.

Among the most notable issues raised with different intensity by different Arab civil societies are: free and fair electoral processes, enforcement of basic human rights, decentralization and empowerment of local governance structures, more efficient public services, more transparent public expenditures, more progress toward gender equity, more universal health coverage, better social protection, sustainable environmental policies, better access to justice, or the right to access public information.

Off course, in most cases, the gap remains wide between the growing ability of Arab CSO's to expose problems and deficits and call for reforms, and their still weak capacity to affect effective change. Their own deficiencies in mobilization skills, alternative policy formulation or coalition building as well as the strong resistance of entrenched ruling elites and vested social interests are still preventing wide ranging public governance reforms.

However, in a number of Arab countries and in several sectors, CSO's were able, in the last few years, to contribute to partial progress on public policy issues. Few examples will illustrate the growing impact of Arab CSO's.

Environmental CSO's were able to raise crucial issues and affect policy change in the nineties in countries like Lebanon, Jordan, Egypt or Morocco. Their interventions ranged in Jordan, from water pollution in West Amman to imported food containing prohibited chemicals; and in Lebanon, from the proliferation of unlicensed quarries affecting landscapes and forests in Mount Lebanon to vehicles gas emissions and air pollution; and in Egypt from solid waste disposal in the suburbs of Cairo and Alexandria to industrial factories air and water pollution. Environmental CSO's were able document persuasively the issues, raise public awareness with the support of the press, and propose and lobby for alternative public policies. Their interventions led to receding import licenses (Jordan), or adopting new air pollution regulations (Lebanon), or enforcing existing laws on industrial pollution (Egypt). In addition to their own strategies, Arab environmental CSO's benefited from a number of favorable conditions: the fact that environmental issues were perceived by ruling elites as relatively non sensitive or threatening; that the vested interests challenged were more marginal or less powerful; and that environmental CSO's themselves were largely composed of and led by middle class or upper middle class elements with influential social and political connections. Environment is one of the few field of public policy where Arab governments are developing relations of consultation and partnership with CSO's, encouraging their role in public education, monitoring and studies and citizen's initiatives.

Public health related CSO's coalitions have succeeded largely in countries like Palestine, partly in Lebanon and Morocco and more marginally in Egypt or Yemen in promoting a more participative, preventative and cost effective approach to public health in their own practices and in proposed reforms of the public sector priorities and practices. They are now regularly consulted by ministries of health and they have participated to national studies of the public health system and to national strategies of public health reforms.

This growing impact has been facilitated, in the nineties, by the gradual retreat of many Arab states from extensive health services delivery and their attempts to rely more on private and civil society providers. By asking non state actors to play a larger role, states had to concede to them a significant voice in public health policy setting.

Women's rights CSOs and national coalitions of women organizations have succeeded in a number of Arab countries in making of gender equity and women empowerment a legitimate and visible issue on the national agenda.

Despite strong resistance by conservative social forces and sometimes by conservative members of parliament, women's CSOs have pushed through major or partial revisions of "personal status legislation" that significantly improved women's rights in marriage and divorce, custody and inheritance, travel abroad or granting of citizenship to children. In Morocco, the parliament recently approved a major progressive revision of the personal status code. In Egypt, through judicial decision, women can now travel abroad without the permission of husbands or fathers and a new legislation entitled them to transmit citizenship to their foreign father born children.

In the public sphere, recent electoral laws in Algeria, Jordan and Morocco mandated quotas for women to increase their numbers in parliament. In several Arab countries a growing number of women have been appointed to ministerial, judicial or diplomatic positions, most notably to the constitutional court of Egypt. Most recently, Lebanon, who was paradoxically behind many Arab countries in the indicators of women participation to public affairs, appointed two woman ministers, a woman acting attorney general, and might introduce a quota for women in its new electoral law.

Despite setbacks like the failure to enact legislation increasing penalties for violence against women in Jordan or legislation granting electoral rights to women in Kuwait, Arab women CSOs are actively pursuing their reformists agenda, sometimes with the support of a section of the ruling elite. In fact, in several Arab countries, the ruling elite has used its partial support for gender equity to project an image of progressiveness outside and to counter religiously based conservative oppositional movements inside.

Regional and local development CSOs, regional cultural associations, neighborhood committees and local clubs in Morocco, Lebanon, Algeria or Yemen have long lobbied for more decentralization, and more empowerment and devolution of functions to local governance structures. Significantly, these countries are relatively more decentralized than the Arab regional average, which is still characterized by a very centralized power structure. A new and progressive local governance law was adopted in Yemen in 2000, and revisions to local governance laws are being considered in the Moroccan and Lebanese parliaments.

In Morocco, local development associations have spread in many regions and were able in many cases to establish good working relations with local authorities. In Lebanon several civil society organizations have signed memorandum of understanding with municipalities. In fact, several of the associations' leaders have been elected mayors or councilors in the recent local elections of Morocco in 2003 and Lebanon in 2004.

Civic associations, democratic advocacy groups, elections monitoring associations as well as professional organizations and other CSO's in Morocco, Algeria, Jordan or Yemen and to some extent Egypt, have contributed to pressures for more competitive and fairer electoral processes and for fewer attempts by the executive power to manipulate the electoral outcome,. Although the improvements were relative, in recent elections, voter registration, balloting, vote counting and the announcements of results were acknowledged to having been more efficient and transparent. The role of the independent electoral commissions was consolidated in Yemen and Palestine and in Egypt the judiciary took charge of elections oversight.

Finally, against a strong resistance of vested interests, a new type of CSO's started recently raising publicly issues of integrity and transparency of both the public and private sectors in countries like Morocco, Lebanon, Jordan, Kuwait or Palestine. Previously taboo topics such as wide spread corruption, traffic of influence, nepotism, abuse of public funds and properties, money laundering and tax evasion are progressively more openly discussed and sometime documented. Although there still a long way to go for the concrete identification, the effective prosecution and the sanctioning of the principal culprits, the growing activism of Arab CSO's has contributed to raising the issue of corruption in the public agendas of few Arab countries.

The examples briefly outlined above indicate that despite résistance, obstacles and limitations, Arab CSO's are starting to influence public governance reforms and public policies in several important fields. Even though many of the changes or the reforms are not yet radical and not necessarily irreversible, the role of the civil society organizations and their impact are gradually becoming more effective and more significant.

BUILDING UP THE ROLE OF ARAB CIVIL SOCIETIES IN PUBLIC GOVERNANCE REFORMS

In conclusion, we will briefly evoke a number of factors or policies that could help develop and consolidate the contribution of Arab CSO's and their influence on public governance reforms.

A first set of policies and measures, to be adopted by Arab public authorities, would help create an ENABLING ENVIRONMENT that will improve the legal framework and ease the working conditions of Arab civil society organizations. Measures such as the following could be considered:

Revise and liberalize associations' laws and other legal and regulatory frameworks governing civil society organizations, including conditions for incorporation, registration, board elections, funding, scope of activities and public control. Instead of government ministries, the idea of an independent public commission to regulate and support the work of CSO's could be explored. In addition, adopt the principles of pluralism and freedom of association within the sector of interest representation (Trade unions, professional associations and business associations).

Adopt legislation and fiscal incentives to encourage national philanthropy, including the establishment of foundations, and to facilitate local private donations to eligible CSO's. Adopt also a more open and competitive framework for public funding and more liberal and transparent regulations for international funding of CSO's.

Empower and genuinely consult the second assemblies and the official consultative bodies, insuring a better representation and voice for the most active civil society organizations within these assemblies. Existing bodies include the Majlis Al Shura (Consultative Council) in Egypt, Bahrain and Yemen, the Majlis Al Mustasharin (Chamber of Councilors) in Morocco and Tunisia, the Majlis Al Ayan (House of Notables) in Jordan, and the Majlis Al Umma (National Council) in Algeria. They also include the Social and Economic Councils in Algeria, Tunisia and Lebanon. These assemblies could be revitalized as fora for rational social dialogue on public policy options and as a framework through which civil society organizations and networks can participate in national public policy formation.

Develop a regular practice of consultation of relevant civil society's organizations by Arab parliaments and parliamentary committees. Parliaments could develop different forms of consultations of CSO's including participation in hearings, presentation of testimonies, submission of policy studies, and recommendation of draft legislation. More formal parliament-civil society fora could also be established.

Include and consult relevant civil society organizations in the preparation and formulation of national sectoral strategies, national and regional development plans and major public projects,

Expand and improve citizen's access to public information, and establish a legally mandated right to information. Arab public documents that are difficult to access include the following, with variations in degree of publicity in the different Arab countries: decisions of Councils of Ministers; parliamentary debates; parliamentary committees' debates; laws and application decrees; detailed national budgets; reports of oversight bodies; national statistics; developments plans and projects documents; national strategies in various sectors; court rulings, and other various public policy documents. Arab civil society organizations and citizens in general should have the right and the practical means to access public documents essential for their understanding of and participation in public policy processes and for holding officials and public institutions accountable to the citizenry.

Strengthen the freedom of expression through expanding the freedom of the press and media, reinforcing academic and research freedoms, and eliminating the various forms of censorship and repression of assemblies, public debates, publications and cultural productions. Arab civil society organizations will directly benefit from an expanded freedom of expression in their capacity to communicate, persuade, dialogue and mobilize Arab citizens around the public interest.

Promote a culture of civic participation, active citizenship and partnership between the state and civil society through the curricula of the public education system and through the programs of the public national Medias.

A second set of initiatives and measures to be adopted by the civil society organizations themselves, would help build up the internal capacity and the external efficiency of Arab CSO's. Measures such as the following could be considered:

Give a priority to the development of membership commitment and participation and to the extension of the larger constituencies in each of the sectors concerned.

Strengthen organizational capacities through training and professionalization of staff when needed and when possible and through building up of communication and advocacy skills.

Adopt democratic and transparent rules of internal governance and improve accountability of leadership to members and constituencies. Rules should include term limits for CSO's leadership and increased financial transparency

Promote a younger, more gender balanced and more charismatic leadership of the civil society organizations.

Build sectoral and national CSO's coalitions for change, learning to work together and to pool services, resources and mobilization capacities.

Develop internal and independent, nationally based sources of funding.

Contribute to a unifying vision for social and political reforms at the national level.

Finally, a number of macro political and economic factors and long term processes will ultimately determine and shape the future of Arab civil societies. Among the most important of these external determinants:

A significant and sustained economic growth and the development of stronger, more independent, private economic actors could reduce the dependency of civil society on the state and the state domination of national economic resources and employment opportunities. A multiplicity of competing economic power centers within Arab societies could strengthen the material base for social and political pluralism.

The breakdown of states and regimes monopolies on media and mass communication, and the gradual emergence of an open, plural and competitive Arab virtual public space will erode and marginalize state control of the public discourse and state constraint on the free circulation of information, opinions and perspectives. In that changing communication context, Arab civil society organizations could significantly improve their ability to reach out for, persuade and influence Arab public opinion and shape the Arab policy and public debates.

The formation of national coalitions for political reforms and the rise of new political elites could produce a new trend of genuine political liberalization in the Arab region. This would create the political will needed to transform state-civil society relations from relations of suppression, control or cooptation to relations of partnership, cooperation and mutual accountability.

The societal and political transformations mentioned above will enlarge in the longer term the sphere of liberty in Arab societies and will create the structural conditions for more active and more influential Arab civil society organizations.
